5 Ways You Can Use...

Flip Cameras

1. Create a project proposing students create their own public service announcements or commercials related to class material.

2. Record students interviewing for a fictitious job, and then play back the interview for them to use for peer and self-assessment.

3. When students deliver speeches in class, record the speeches so they can view themselves later on and provide self-assessments.

4. Allow students to get creative and record “demonstrations” of various things with the flip cameras to share with the class.

5. For a project at the end of the semester, have students create video diaries to reflect their learning in the class.

More Ideas for Using Flip Cameras...

- Have students create mock news segments related to classroom material.
- Flip cameras have great potential for use in conjunction with English classes; instruct students to create their own short films illustrating literary devices, have them act out and film various parts of novels to share with the class, or have them create “The Diary of...” and choose a character from a novel.
- Give students a topic to teach the class about, and have them create a video lesson to share with the class.
- Instructors can record demonstrations or experiments for students who may have missed a class or who want to review for exams.
