

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL. Digital Network W.S.J.com MarketWatch BARRONS All Things Digital. FINS SmartMoney More ▾ News, Quotes, Companies, Videos SEARCH

Thursday, April 8, 2010

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL. OPINION JOURNAL

U.S. Edition ▾ Today's Paper ▾ Video ▾ Columns ▾ Blogs ▾ Topics ▾ Journal Community Log In ▾

Home World U.S. Business Markets Tech Personal Finance Life & Style Opinion Careers Real Estate Small Business

April 8, 2010

In Praise of Illinois

Democrats take baby steps on pension reform.

The Pew Center on the States recently honored Illinois as the state with the biggest public pension mess. So it's a minor miracle that the state's Democratic legislature passed, and Democratic Governor Pat Quinn is expected to sign, a pension reform that at least takes baby steps in trimming the state's retirement largesse for its 700,000 government workers. Perhaps bankruptcy concentrates the mind.

A new report by Charles Wheeler of the University of Illinois Springfield summarizes the state's problem this way: "To say Illinois faces a hole in funding its public employee pension systems is like saying the Grand Canyon is an impressive ravine." He finds that the state's five retirement systems "will need roughly $131 billion to cover benefits already earned by public workers, with only $46 billion in expected revenues to cover the costs."

In other words, the state only has about 35 cents for every dollar it must pay in the future. If Illinois were to devote every penny for three years from its income and sales taxes, it still wouldn't have enough to meet these unfunded liabilities. No wonder the state's credit rating is the second worst in the nation, behind only California.

State workers can retire with full benefits at age 55. Most get an automatic 3% wage increase each year, regardless of inflation. Workers can and do get retirement benefits while still working full-time for the state. More than 3,500 state workers pocket annual pensions of more than $100,000, and the highest pension is $391,000 a year, according to National Taxpayers United of Illinois.

It took public outrage over these benefits and a chronic budget deficit of $6 billion to get the legislature to act. The reforms include increasing the retirement age for full benefits to 67; capping annual pensions for the highest paid workers at a still high $106,800, and prohibiting double dipping on a pension and public paycheck at the same time.

As Kristina Rasmussen of the Illinois Policy Institute points out, "these were the bare minimum reforms. They only apply to newly hired employees, not existing employees." The reforms thus do nothing to close the existing unfunded liability. A worker that has been on the job for one month still qualifies for the old pension windfall.

Illinois unions are nonetheless furious and are blasting what they call a "pension slashing bill" that benefits the "elite corporate class," as if middle-class taxpayers are elites. The union solution: Raise taxes. Democrats rarely oppose union demands, so even though these pension reforms are far short of what's needed, we'll salute them. Let's hope this is the start of a nationwide backlash against the scandal of runaway public pensions.